

When collaboration issues become a pattern for your students and staff — whether it's a poor connection to faculty conference call, or cumbersome online classes — it's a problem demands immediate attention. As daunting as that task may sound, the benefits far outweigh the effort — especially if your new provider can pave the way for you.

Success starts at onboarding

As the SaaS trend grows, unfortunately so too does the number of failed SaaS implementations. Often, it's due to poorly defined objectives, misunderstood business needs and unclear pricing.¹

The right provider will work with you and your school to avoid these potential pitfalls. It's what makes a full onboarding experience so important. If you don't have the right guide at the start of your journey toward a new collaboration solution, you're likely to repeat the mistakes of your first.

But when your onboarding is handled by a business partner like GoToMeeting, all the pieces fall into place. Our onboarding truly makes a difference, as our customers can attest: "Out of the box, GoToMeeting has done a great job of providing their own online training and support that works very well," said Daniel Rivera, technical service manager for the Make-A-Wish Foundation.

We pride ourselves on welcoming every kind of educational institution from the from small tutoring firms to large, multi-campus universities with customized onboarding plans, including:

- Live and on-demand training
- Access to our communities
- 24/7 phone and web support

you don't have to worry about GoToMeeting not working. "I trust GoToMeeting because it

Educators and students depend on their collaboration tools to work when they need them. Dropped calls and audio issues are more than inconveniences. They're deal-breakers. If your faculty and students cannot get work done on their terms — where and how they want — it can have a dramatic impact on their success.
